Australian-born interior designer Lynlea West was living in southeast London with husband Gareth and son Lucas, now 11, when the thorny issue of primary schools arose. 'We were surrounded by lots of outstanding primary schools but fell just outside their catchment areas,' she says. 'We came to a summer fair at a school a couple of miles away and I loved the vibe, so we began looking to buy in the area,' says Lynlea.

They had seen almost 50 houses when they came across an unloved Eighties 'infill' house, built where a bomb had landed during the Second World War. 'Despite its tired state we were sure we'd be able to extend into the large garden,' says Lynlea. The purchase went through and the family moved in in late 2011. They planned to turn it from a three- to a four-bedroom home with a large kitchen, but circumstances dictated the work began sooner than anticipated.

'Alec, who is now seven, was on the way, so extending into the loft became a priority,' says Lynlea. Despite her bump, Lynlea would climb a ladder to the loft to see how it was going. 'Alec arrived about a month before it was finished so it was all a bit chaotic,' she says.

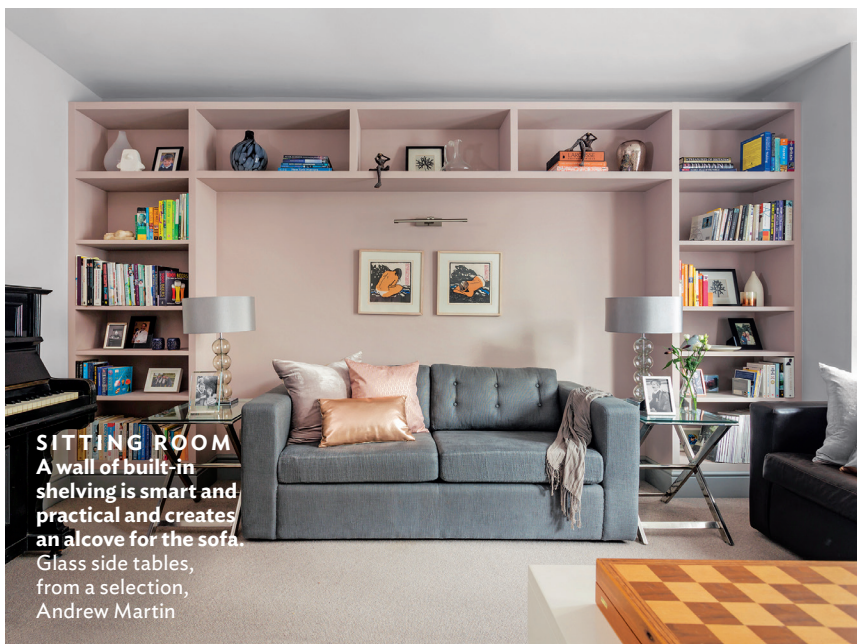

A few years later, in 2015, work began on the extension. 'It took about four months,' says Lynlea. 'The builder set us up a temporary kitchen in our sitting room. The kids really loved it because we convinced them to imagine they were on a camping holiday.'

The couple redecorated throughout in a neutral palette with modern luxe touches, and replaced the family bathroom. 'I like clean lines and simplicity, but it's also about the details and textures for me,' says Lynlea. 'For example, I like neutral linen fabrics but might add sequined cushions or a patterned velvet,' she explains.

Downstairs, the kitchen-diner has pale painted walls with units in both a white lacquer and natural timber finish. Distinctive copper pendant lights, navy leather bar stools and the glass-topped extending dining table all help bring the kitchen to life. Sliding doors lead to the patio garden, with pale walls and horizontal fencing. 'My garden is a little nod to Australia,' says Lynlea.

Upstairs, there are three bedrooms, one of which doubles as an office, plus a family bathroom, while on the top floor the loft extension houses the master bedroom and en suite.

Lynlea worked on large luxury hotel projects before opening her own residential interior design company, Lynlea West Studio, and relishes working with smaller budgets. 'It makes it all the more satisfying when you achieve something you feel proud of,' she says. 25
